when the work was about completed, and when the boiler exploded with terrific force, throwing one of its ends a distance of 425 feet in one direction cutting off in its course three eight inches in diameter, throwing the other end in an opposite direction; throwing portions of the boiler sheets into the surrounding field and scattering the boiler tubes, bent and twisted in every direction. Two of the Portland crew, a section foreman of the Grand Trunk Railway who was present at the time, and the engineer at the mill were instantly killed. The body of one of the Portland men was found at a distance of some three or four hundred feet where it had been thrown by the force of the explosion, the body of another was found beside the road some fifteen feet distant, and the bodies of the remaining two among the debris. The boiler was blown into atoms, the engine, standing a short distance away, was partially destroyed, the boiler house utterly wrecked, the dry house broken in upon one side, the whole mill thrown several inches from its foundation, the machinery more or less injured, and a large amount of stock, manufactured and unmanufactured, destroyed or damaged. The plaintiff also introduced the testimony of experts from Portland and Boston relative to the method of riveting and caulking under pressure and determining the tightness of work of this kind.

The defendant offered in evidence the correspondence between the company and the plaintiff to show the work they claimed to have contracted to do, and claimed that they were simply required to furnish the dome head, and send men to rivet in the same, to talk and seam and make the work tight. The defendant also claimed that the men who were sent to do the work were instructed simply to do this, and that they did not in any manner assume control over filling the boiler with water, the getting up of steam, the fixing of the pressure for testing the work, or that they had anything whatever to do with the regulating of the safety valve, and claimed that the work had been completed a few minutes before the explosion occurred, and that the explosion was wholly due to structural defects in the boiler. The defendant also introduced the testimony of men in this State and Massachusetts, engaged in the manufacturing and repairing of boilers, as to the thickness and quality of the iron and steel used in their construction, and the practice of boiler-makers as to making repairs and caulking their work under steam pressure, and denied that the caulking done upon the dome head in any way contributed to the cause of the explosion, and offered evidence to show that the plates of the boiler had been sheared so close to the edge of the rivets that they were insufficiently secured; that the plates had suffered from corrosion by reason of the use of poor water; that the boiler was made of iron too light for the service required of it; that the hole in the shell under the dome was made too large, thereby reducing the strength of the boiler; and that the bracing was insufficient and defective.

Eminent counsel were employed by both sides. The docket shows the counsel on this case to be Holmes & Payson, Herriek, and Sweeney for the plaintiff; Symonds & Libby and Bisbee & Hersey for the defense. The counsel actively engaged in the case were Hon. George F. Holmes of Portland; Addison E. Herriek, Esq., of Bethel; and Hon. John P. Sweeney, of Canton, for the plaintiff; Hon. Charles F. Libby, of Portland, and Hon. George D. Bisbee, of Buckfield, for the defense.

The case was one of rare interest and importance. A great amount of expert testimony was introduced and every point was sharply contested, objections and "exceptions" being used quite freely. Models of the boiler and parts, tools with which the repairing was done, photographs of the wrecked mill after the explosion and other paraphernalia were put in evidence, and a person interested in the subject might by listening to this case have gained valuable information relative to the building, repairing, care, use and abuse of steam boilers. In fact, the information drawn out by the examination was the result of years of experience and study on the part of the expert witnesses who were upon the stand.

A special session was held Friday evening at which time Mr. Libby completed his argument for the defense. Saturday forenoon was occupied by the arguments of Mr. Sweeney for the plaintiff and Judge Herriek's charge to the jury. The case was given to the jury at the adjournment of Court at 1 o'clock Saturday afternoon and with very little delay, they returned a verdict for the defendant.

In the case of Dearborn vs. Tebbetta, Capt. Dearborn failed to appear Monday forenoon and a non-suit was entered. Exceptions taken and allowed. The case goes to the Law Court. As we go to press the case of Bartlett vs. Goddard and Wornell is on trial.
